In this apparently rare phenomenon and plans to come out to take pictures.
The Millers intend to let Punchy stay as long as he likes. They're hoping he'll stay indefinitely.
Once in a while Mrs. Miller has been afraid that he would fly away.
"One day he flew on top of the house," she said. "It nearly broke my heart—I thought 'well, that's it, he's gone.'"

Mrs. Miller states that the statue of the duck in their back yard is actually in memory of a duck whom the children once had.
One of these days the Millers plan to buy some statues of baby ducks, so that Punchy won't think that his efforts will have been in vain.
"We'll even get one to look like him," Mrs. Miller said smiling. "I'm afraid to try it now, though. He might fly away then."
In the meantime, the two are as inseparable as, well, Punch and Judy.
